Market Review

Anxiety surrounding the geopolitical risks reached a climax with the escalation of military tensions between the US and North Korea. It was rapidly followed by heightened political risks from the US as President Trump was forced to the disbandment of two of his key advisory councils after the much criticized comments around the protests in Charlottesville.

Financial Markets were not immune to this increased level of stress surrounding geopolitical and political risks and have used these events as catalysts for some profit taking after a good run of performances on most of the asset classes, especially the most risky ones.

Aside from this, the momentum on the economic front has gained back some traction in the US. This comes after markets were hesitant regarding 1/ the actual capability of Mr. Trump to pass significant reforms, especially on the fiscal front and 2/ the expected pick-up in inflation which still needs to materialize. The confirmation that the Q1 slowdown was only temporary was also backed up by a strong earnings season from corporates. In the US, above 2/3 of the companies have either published in line or above analysts' earnings expectations and also have been revising up outlook for earnings.

The economic momentum appears especially strong in Europe propelled by the prospects of reforms. This is best assessed by the level of the EURUSD currency which has reached levels not seen since early 2015, which could potentially morph into a game changer.

Portfolio Performance

In August, the Fund has lost 0.24%. We have suffered on the equity part of the portfolio amid increased geopolitical risks that created some volatility. The fixed income part was slightly positive as interest rates fell while credit spreads remained restrained. On the currencies side, we had a negative impact on the back of the strong Euro which appreciated by 0.6% in August.

We have kept equity exposure relatively stable during the month at around 45% but have reduced somewhat the overweight to European equities in favor of the US and Emerging Markets. In the fixed income part of the portfolio, we have increased the duration from 3 to 4 as inflation expectations still remain subdued while geopolitical risks still linger.

Market Outlook

Global Macro environment calls for an investment strategy that favors risky assets. We prefer zones that still exhibit a potential for rerating, the Eurozone at the forefront.

The question is thus twofold: 1/ will the geopolitical situation be able to derail the economic cycle? and 2/ will this create a buying opportunity on oversold asset classes across the board? Financial Markets remain exposed to changing dynamics in geopolitics in this transition to a multi-polar world, this could have drastic impacts on markets. While we expect Geopolitics and US Politics to remain a potential source of volatility going forward, we do not believe in their potential to derail the ongoing cyclical recovery.
